A Message from Nancy: Middle School Girls Lead Seder that Goes Beyond Passover

The 2018 Seder Girls

I would imagine that many of us have had that experience at least once in our lifetimes-when the printed word becomes concrete. As an educator, I experienced that feeling in an awe-inspiring moment. Several year ago, I read Ron Berger's "Ethic of Excellence" in which he describes transforming schools into communities of excellence in which students are both independent and team learners, whose research and work lead to positive outcomes that touch others outside the walls of their schools. At the end of the book, I was left in wonder-and wondering how this could happen in real life.

Then came the phenomenon known as the 2018 Seder Girls of the Solomon Schechter Day School of Greater Hartford. At a conference in the fall, Andrea met the founders and Head of School of the Grace Academy, an all-girls middle and high school in Hartford. After hearing that the Grace Academy 5th grade class learns about Passover and conducts a mock seder, Andrea invited their 5th and 6th grade classes to Schechter to participate in a seder conducted by our Middle School girls. In mid-February, I began meeting with our 6th and 7th grade girls to tackle the project.

At one of our first lunchtime sessions, the girls enthusiastically chattered about their favorite parts of the seder that just had to be included in our seder with Grace Academy. We encouraged the girls to think carefully about the background knowledge of their guests in creating the seder.

They paused, and then the thoughts began to flow. "We might not understand where they're coming from. They might not understand where we're coming from, and how we got to where we are. We need to explain the seder." They considered the issue of language: "We need to keep the Hebrew because that's our language. So, we'll have Hebrew, and transliteration so they can participate, and English so they understand what it's about."

Their excitement and motivation grew, and the twice a week lunch meetings turned into 3, 4 and then 5 days a week of meetings during lunch and recess. Along the way, the group expanded to include our 5th grade female student as well. The girls chose the parts of the seder that they felt were most important and would be engaging for the Grace Academy girls. In pairs, they studied their sections, answered guiding questions that helped them express their personal connections more deeply and wrote out their parts. One pair wrote a short, engaging skit, telling the story of Passover that would follow the Four Questions. The result was a beautiful, educational haggadah that contained traditional text as well as the personal insights of this magnificent group.

Reflecting on this process, it is clear that this project did not happen in a vacuum. From early years, our students have studied Torah text in pairs, analyzing it together, listening to each other, and valuing the opinions and contributions of their classmates. They learn that the stories of our past, of our people, remain ours to this day. Repeated biblical verses such as "Remember that you were once strangers in a land not yours. Remember that you were slaves," as well as the lessons of rabbinic texts play an integral role in helping our students create their places in the world. The Hebrew language, shared values, Jewish life and family traditions are invaluable components of this foundation.

However, in addition to all of that, it also took motivated, engaged and excited learners who were ready to step up and step in. The girls were prepared to "sweat the details," editing the Haggadah for content as well as format, making sure that each girl had the space to share her voice, and thinking deeply and with great care and concern for the needs and comfort of their guests. They gave up their free time, practiced the skit, adding creative staging and humor, and created google docs that they shared with each other so that they could literally all be on the same page. In the last week leading up to the seder, the girls spent more than six hours working on the haggadah and seder - and none of that came from class time. It was at some point during this process that I realized that through their efforts, our students had embodied Berger's book and had created a community of excellence.

The seder, itself, defied all expectations. Our students were prepared, poised and confident. As the Grace Academy girls entered, our girls were ready with warm, welcoming smiles, name tags, and seating arrangements that mixed the two schools together. Some memorable moments: the expression on the face of the Grace student, surrounded by cheering new and old friends, when she found the afikoman... the banter between the girls leading up to tasting the shemura matza... watching our girls lead the seder as naturally as breathing... listening to the Grace girls singing along with the chorus to dayenu. There was so much more!

On the day of the seder, I experienced another peak moment in which the abstract takes form. While I was feeling a bit sad that our time together was ending, I discovered that the girls were already thinking ahead, moving on to their next project: an Earth Day program for the school. At that moment, I realized with pride and awe that the Seder Girls had lifted the statement, "Be the change" off the paper, creating the most breathtaking reality: our students ARE the change!

Chag sameach,
Nancy Rosen

A note from Matt Fitzsimons, Head of School at Grace Academy:

Dear Riva, Jessica, Andrea and the Solomon Schechter community,

On behalf of the Grace Academy community, I wish to thank you for hosting our girls to a beautiful Seder meal.

At Grace Academy, we work to instill in our girls five Core Values: academic excellence, courageous compassion, respect, hospitality and grace. Your students demonstrated all of these values, and the warm hospitality your students exhibited made our students feel right at home.

From the moment we arrived in the parking lot, three girls came to the door wearing name tags and they greeted each Grace girl with a warm and welcoming smile.

I, along with our three teachers, were most impressed with the booklet, presentations which engaged our girls in the readings, and the very entertaining and instructive skit. The entire program ran like clockwork. Your students clearly showed their pride in their school and their work.

Most surprising of all was the huge meal you shared with us.

Today, at our morning assembly - our Circle of Peace and Respect - we had students share their experiences.

We look forward to further collaborations with you and to having your girls visit our school in the near future.

Peace and blessings to you this Passover season,
Matt

EC3 Inquisitive Artists!

The children in EC3 have transformed into inquisitive artists! They have been exploring the world of painting and learning all about its history.

Our Reggio-inspired project will take EC3 on a journey that will educate their minds and inspire the artists that lie within. The children began their research with Vincent Van Gogh. The students learned about his struggles to gain recognition as an artist and how his hardships did not discourage him from pursuing his passion.

Throughout his life, he continued to paint and find beauty in his surroundings. In his words, "If you truly love nature, you will find beauty everywhere." Some of his most famous paintings were still life's of sunflowers.

EC3 painted their very own sunflower still life. Their excitement for this lesson was perfectly captured in their own words. Students made observations about the painting process: "You get orange by mixing two colors." Another student announced, "That sunflower is beautiful! "

One student chimed in, "I cannot wait to be an artist!" Each of the budding artists shared this enthusiasm.

Stay tuned for what's to come and be sure to visit EC3, which is transforming into a blank canvas that will be filled with our children's artistic touch.

The Impact of Schooling on the Development of the Life-long Learner

In the past two decades, dramatic advancements in neuroscience have given researchers a better understanding of how children, adolescents and adults learn. Scientists are discovering how memory works and what contributes to, or interferes with good memory function.

Two components of this research are particularly important for parents and teachers. These critical factors are: the role of emotion in learning and the impact of the school environment in developing the ideal graduate, defined as the life-long learner.

Independent schools have distinct advantages for students over the increasingly compliance-driven model that characterizes public education in the No Child Left Behind era.

After 46 years spent working with students and families, Dr. Lyons will share research and personal anecdotes that illustrate the influences that shape a child's journey from innocence to maturity.

Presenter: Doug Lyons, Executive Director of Connecticut Association of Independent Schools (CAIS)
